NORTH WEYMOUTH.

Rev. Mr. Perry, of Quincy, gave his fourth lecture of the course in the Universalist vestry Wednesday evening, his popular lectures attracting large audiences.

Dr. Tuckman, still attends here, and gives a brief description of Palestine, full of interest and instruction. The next lecture will be given one week from next Wednesday, and as there will be a crowded house, seats must be secured early.

Grand Nightingale and Illumination.

The rest of the notes cast for the beneficial lectures in the Athol St. schools Tuesday were as follows: Intermediate, Dec. 23, Dec. 22, Primary, Jan. 4, Dec. 4, Total, $4 for Garfield, $8 for Hancock, and Garfield was declared elected.

added to the committee, with instructions to get all the information he could in regard to the proposed meeting in April. He traveled, and was convinced that the committee had done their work well, and had obtained all the necessary facts, and the truth and nothing but the truth.
The town accepted the report and instructed him to purchase the crusher, engine

Literary Reading.

BEAR IT LIKE A MAN.

When the skies of life are dreary, When the heart grows sick and weary Try the better plan.
See in darkness, promised light, Hope for morning after night, Turn your footsteps to the right,
And bear it like a man.

Sometimes you will deem it lonely, Still keep striving onward, only
Try the better plan.
When you fall to win the race,
When no sunshine you can trace,
When the stream bears in your face,
Bear it like a man.

Never tell you life is folly—Never give way to melancholy—
Try the better plan.
Do not fancy all mankind Bent on keeping you behind;
Some must lose while some will find;
Bear it like a man.

Time, the sea is ebbing,
No man makes head against it,
Try the better plan.
This is what the brave would do,
This is what the brave would do,
Venture, they will raise you too—
Bear it like a man.

'Tis not how much ground you cover;
It is the true will you have,
Do the best you can.
Earth is but a changing shore, Nothing can be the past forever—
At the end of the race—more—
Bear it like a man.

Then came the captives. Eight hundred first from New Hampshire, Conquered and Michigan. Weary, worn and hungry from prolonged travel, cooped like beasts in freight cars.

Down from the depot they marched wearily on through the shifting sands, and the jeers and taunts of a gaping crowd.

The gate opened.
The multitude swallowed them.
Then they saw walls of pine, a slimy brown creek, six feet wide, and five inches deep, struggling through the soft mud, and a waste of yellow sand dotted with huge stumps. And there were no buildings, no sheds, no shelter, no concealment from pelting storms, no screen from the blizing sun.

The following description of the rebel prison pen, at Andersonville, is a piece of word-painting is remarkable; yet there are many men living to-day throughout the Union who will feel, as they read it, that even this does not adequately describe the horrors which caused so many to shudder even at this late date.

A railroad running north and south between Macon and Americus; four or five straggling rough and shanty resting drowsily on the yellow sand west of the road; twenty or thirty people as ragged and rickety as the buildings—such was Andersonville before the Confederacy made it synonymous with all that is cruel and brutal. West of the railroad, and but a few dozen yards removed from it are two marshes in which swamps of mud and reeds and swamp oaks, decaying wood, rank weeds and rank grass are distilled into poison.

The marshes are 150 feet apart, one above and one below the town. From the marshes the poison runs off in two leafy bays, sluggish currents across the railroad track, and unite 1400 feet east of it. From this confluence of poisons the stream, in lethargic flow, runs nearly due east, between hills with gradual swell on either side till it is lost in the Little Sweetwater, less than a mile below.

Five hundred yards from the confluence of the two little streams, that noze out of the marshes, there is another marsh. Among this marsh the Andersonville prison-pen was constructed.

As finally completed the pen is an oblong, 780 by 1620 feet, the stream occupying its narrowest part, about 160 feet south of the center.

"Said" Winder superintendent of the building of the pen. When he began, the marsh and the hills that rise on either side of it were clothed with heavy timber.

Early in December, 1862, Winder was at work; the people of the surrounding country came to look on.
The whole population of Americus, a little town a few miles below, was on thicket with excitement.

"Got so many Yanks don't know what to do with them 'uns all."

"Gwine to build a prison at Audubon."

"Let's go."

Among those who went was Ambrose Spencer. When he arrived, the negroes were digging long trenches; other negroes were felling trees, others again were chewing their sides.

"What are these for?" said Spencer.

"Winder looked. 'What?'"

"The trees felled on two sides."

"We put one end in the ground in that trench, the hewed sides close together, then pack dirt about them. The result will be a close pen with walls twenty feet high."

"Ah!"

"Heckon that'll hold 'em."

"Going to erect barracks or shelter of any kind?"

"No. The drafted Yanks who will be put here will have no need of 'em."

"Why, then, are you cutting down the trees? They will prove a shelter to the prisoners from the heat of the sun, at least."

"That is just what I am cutting them down; I am going to build a pen here that will kill more Yanks than can be destroyed in the front!"

"Said" Winder turned away and Jim Spencer removed his "veggies" long enough to suggest.

"That air-mash
in the center of the pen'll help kill
'em mighty fast."

"But why," said Spencer, "don't they build the pen below (above the marsh)?"

"Don't want ter, I reckon."

"That water would kill a dog."

"Yass."

"There's Little Sweetwater, five feet deep and twenty feet wide, and five hundred feet from where they are building the pen, and not a marsh in it."

"Why don't they put the prison there?"

"This'll serve bettah, reckon."

"They could go below the marsh and take in both creeks, Little Sweetwater and this Double Branch run."
